

LUNCHEONS IN LENT

THESE, WITH DINNERS, FORM A POPULAR STYLE OF ENTERTAINMENT. Some Novelties to be Introduced in Way of Table Decorations—Personal Gossip.

Dinners and luncheons are the popular form of entertainment during these Lenten days, not only in this city, but almost everywhere else. The society papers are filled with accounts of them, and many pretty fashions are introduced to give variety. Indianapolis has had ever so many pretty entertainments of this kind. The decorations or name cards usually are varied. Pink prevails almost to the exclusion of any other color. At one of the dinners the table was decorated with pink satin ribbon bows and pink roses. At each corner were bows with streamers of broad satin ribbon, and tied in the bows were a half dozen pink roses. At another company, at each corner were bouquets of pink carnations, tied with pink satin ribbon. At another table were bouquets of pink roses for the ladies and violets for the men, and ribbons were arranged on the table; at another rose, and tiny empire wreaths were laid on the table, and at still another bows with streamers and many of pink ribbons. There were olive leaf empire wreaths tied with yellow bows for each cover, and larger ones of the same style for each end of the table. At still another there was only a basket of roses for the center of the table, but a different colored rose was served with each course, and these were the guests' favors.

The following are suggestions for luncheons from the New York Times:

A Pompadour Luncheon—This is, indeed, lovely, and yet not so extravagant as it looks. On the plain white cloth run wide ribbons of pale blue, pink and yellow placed about six inches apart. Between the ribbons are zigzag fashions on the white background, terminating evenly with the ends of ribbons that have been fringed and tied at the ends. In the center place a large bow (with wired upright loops) of the three ribbons holding in its center a small bouquet of vases manufactured to hold long-stemmed roses. In this vase is a cluster of pink and yellow roses tied with a bow knot of pale blue ribbon. The various pretty dishes of the luncheon can be set where most desirable, being that no two plates need correspond, provided all are decorated with flowers in dainty tins.

A Delft luncheon, this being a present popular color and calls for blue and white, and every one knows. Have your best tablecloth of white. Along the center and out to the sides in the form of a cross lay blue bouquets filled with white carnations. In the very center of the cross place a large vase of blue china or porcelain on a tall, substantial foundation can be easily made at home, or if money is not wanted, from the local florist. Under each plate have a dolly worked in the center of the table. Use your blue and white china, and dainty candlesticks of the popular ware surrounded by white paper shades and small white vases. The latest novelty at a very trifling money outlay.

A lady who was about to give a tea had her different appointments for her tea table gathered in her dining room, ready to be set. On the buffet were the candles, all white, in their candlesticks, and one set of three formed a sort of tripod. Suddenly the lady sat down and gasped out: "Why, it seems just exactly as if I were getting ready for high mass!" When the table was set and the candles were surrounded with pink, violet, rose and blue flowers, the colored flowers their snowy funeral effect was somewhat lessened. None of the guests noticed it, but the hostess could not keep it out of her mind.

It is not infrequent that one who is entertaining closes her front doors and makes an additional room for her guests out of her reception hall. When this is done the sign for the guests to go to the side door is a rope of green stretched across the steps or porch. At a house where a large reception was given, not so very long ago, such a rope was placed. One of the guests did not seem to understand what was expected of her and she asked the hostess, "What is the rope for?" The hostess, who was in the room, and the door not being opened, she waited for the bell after waiting for several minutes. Finally, the hostess opened the door and the inside, some one opened the door and the crack and told her to go to the side door. When she went in she was told to go to the side door, but she explained afterward that she was so tired she was unable to make guests stand under the rope, but she really did not feel that she was well enough acquainted with Mrs. H. to go to her back door.

At an evening company of perhaps fifty or sixty guests, given by one of the belles of this city, one of those fortunate enough to be invited had a very comparative stranger in the city. During the evening she found herself standing near some one to whom she had been introduced and with whom she had been having a very friendly conversation. Suddenly she looked at her companion in a sort of questioning way, and she wondered if she might ask her a question. She asked her the name of the place, and she lowered her voice and said: "What queer-looking people; do you know, I have never met these people before. Are they the people of Indianapolis?" "Well," responded the companion addressed, "if you had lived here as long as my cousin has, and the stranger, who she knew in an instant she had been talking to one of the relatives.

There is a popular woman in town who has learned a few things from her experiences since coming here a few years ago. When she first came a bride she went to housekeeping, she was told by scores of those she met that she would have trouble with the servant question. Not only the old, but the new residents had had this trouble. She smiled as if she knew better, and she felt certain she would be not only able to get good servants but that she would keep them, and that housekeeping, as far as she was concerned, would be an easy matter. From what she said and what she did, she seemed to have a little self-satisfactory feeling. She would succeed so well that people would wonder how she did it. To her disappointment, it was just as difficult for her to get and keep a good Bridget or Nera as it was for any one else. She had a struggle, and for a particularly hard one, for the last few months. Having a nice home, she desired a girl of good appearance, one who would be in dress and wear caps; one, in short, who would be a credit to the house. A few days ago she thought she would call on her housemaid, and she let the fact be known to her friends. One day while she was at home a very neat girl came and said: "I heard you wanted a second girl." "Yes, I am in want of a second girl. Where have you been working?" The girl named some prominent families. "Have you any references?" "The girl did not stop to answer the question, but went on to say that she knew pink calico dresses and that she had nice aprons and caps. 'Yes,' she continued, 'I have always worn caps and I had nice caps.' This is rather unusual for a maid to do. 'I thought I would like to live with you, for I heard you were kind and kind.' 'You are a kind lady,' she continued. 'I was rather a leading question, but the lady smiled and said: 'They look just like 'Arnt my gloves dandy? They look just like shop girls' gloves.' I have to be so late setting home, I have to go to avoid these crowded cars with shop girls, for the odds is always terrible." With contempt and disgust the passengers exchanged glances, and at last, when the neighborhood of Fifth street was reached, many were the sighs of relief heard as the two women arose to leave.

The writer was curious to know the name of the woman and a little of her history, and, upon investigation, learned the following: The husband is a very quiet, kind and considerate man, a clerk in a downtown railroad office, and on a modest salary. A few years ago the wife's mother died, leaving a little property and money.
